

The Holy Orthodox Church was founded by our Lord Jesus Christ and is the living manifestation of His presence in the history of humankind. The most significant characteristics of Orthodoxy are its rich liturgical life and its faithfulness to the apostolic tradition. It is believed by Orthodox Christians that their Church has preserved the tradition and continuity of the ancient Church in its fullness compared to other Christian denominations that have departed from the common tradition of the Church of the first ten centuries. Today, the Orthodox Church numbers approximately 300 million Christians who follow the faith and practices that were defined by the first seven ecumenical councils. The word "orthodox" (upright belief and glory) has traditionally been used in the Greek-speaking Christian world to designate communities or individuals who preserved the true faith (as defined by those councils), versus those who were declared heretical. The official designation of the Church in its liturgical and canonical texts is the "Orthodox Catholic Church" (Greek: catholicos = universal).

The Orthodox Church is a family of autocephalous (self governing) churches, while the Ecumenical Patriarch (of Constantinople) holds titular or honorary primacy as primus inter pares (the first among equals). Thus, the Orthodox Church is not a centralized organization headed by a supreme pontiff. The unity of the Church is rather manifested in common faith and communion in the sacraments. No one but Christ himself is the real head of the Church.

The number of autocephalous churches has varied in history. Today there are many, such as the patriarchate of Constantinople (Istanbul), of Alexandria (Egypt), of Antioch (with headquarters in Damascus, Syria) and the patriarchates of Jerusalem, Russia, Ukraine, Serbia, Romania, the churches of Bulgaria, Georgia, Cyprus, Greece, Poland, the Czechlands and Slovak, Albania, France and Western Europe, Africa and America. There are also autonomous jurisdictions (some of which retaining a token canonical dependence upon a mother see) in Sinai, Crete, Finland, Japan, China and Ukraine. In addition there is also a large Orthodox Diaspora scattered all over the world and administratively divided among various jurisdictions. The first nine autocephalous churches are headed by patriarchs, the others by archbishops or metropolitans. Such titles are strictly honorary, since all bishops are completely equal in the power granted to them by the Holy Spirit.

The order of precedence, in which the autocephalous churches are listed, does not reflect their actual influence or numerical importance. The Patriarchates of Constantinople, Alexandria and Antioch, for example, present only shadows of their past glory. Yet there remains a consensus that Constantinople's primacy of honor (recognized by the ancient Canons, because it was the capital of the ancient Byzantine empire) should remain a symbol and tool of church unity and cooperation. Modern pan-Orthodox conferences were thus convoked by the ecumenical patriarch (of Constantinople). Several of the autocephalous churches are de facto national churches, by far the largest being the Russian Orthodox Church. However, it is not the criterion of nationality but rather the territorial principle that is the norm of organization in the Orthodox Church.

In the wider theological sense, Orthodoxy is not merely a type of purely earthly organization that is headed by patriarchs, bishops and priests who hold the ministry in the Church officially called "Orthodox". Holy Orthodoxy is the mystical "Body of Christ", the head of which is Christ Himself (see Eph. 1:22-23 and Col. 1:18, 24 et seq.). Its composition includes not only priests but all who truly believe in Christ, who have entered the Church He founded – those living on earth and those who have died in faith and piety.

The Great Schism between the Eastern and the Western Church (1054) was the culmination of a gradual process of estrangement between the east and west that began in the first centuries of the Christian era and continued throughout the Middle Ages. Linguistic and cultural differences as well as political events contributed to the estrangement. From the 4th to the 11th century, Constantinople, the center of Eastern Christianity, was also the capital of the Eastern Roman or Byzantine Empire, while Rome after the barbarian invasions fell under the influence of the Holy Roman Empire of the West, a political rival. In the west, theology remained under the influence of St. Augustine of Hippo (354-430) and gradually lost its immediate contact with the rich theological tradition of the Christian East.

Theological differences could have probably been settled, if there had not been not two different concepts of church authority. The growth of Roman primacy, based on the concept of the apostolic origin of the Church of Rome (which claimed not only titular but also jurisdictional authority above other churches) was incompatible with traditional Orthodox ecclesiology. Eastern Christians considered all churches as sister churches and understood the primacy of the Roman bishop only as primus inter pares among his brother bishops. For the East, the highest authority in settling doctrinal disputes could by no means be the authority of a single branch or a single bishop but an Ecumenical Council of all sister churches. In the course of time, the Church of Rome adopted various heterodox teachings that were not based on Holy Tradition and finally proclaimed the teaching of papal infallibility when teaching ex cathedra. This widened the gap even more between the Christian East and West. The Protestant communities, which split from Rome in the course of centuries, diverged even more from the teaching of the Holy Fathers and the Holy Ecumenical Councils.

Due to these serious dogmatic differences, the Orthodox Church is not in communion with the Roman Catholic and Protestant communities. Some Orthodox theologians do not recognize the ecclesial and salvific character of these western churches at all, while others accept that the Holy Spirit acts to a certain degree within these communities, though they do not possess the fullness of grace and spiritual gifts like the Orthodox Church. Many Orthodox theologians are of the opinion that between Orthodoxy and heterodox confessions, especially in the sphere of spiritual experience, the understanding of God and salvation, there exists an ontological difference which cannot be simply ascribed to cultural and intellectual estrangement of the East and West but is a direct consequence of a gradual abandonment of the sacred Tradition by heterodox Christians.

At the time of the Schism of 1054 between Rome and Constantinople, the Eastern Orthodox Church with its center in Constantinople, the capital of the Byzantine Empire (also called New Rome) had spread throughout the Middle East, the Balkans and Russia. The vicissitudes of history have greatly modified the internal structures of the Orthodox Church; even today, the bulk of its members live in the same geographic areas. Missionary expansion toward Asia and emigration toward the West, however, have helped to spread the presence of Orthodoxy worldwide. Today, the Orthodox Church is present almost everywhere in the world and is bearing witness of true, apostolic and patristic tradition to all peoples.

The Orthodox Church is well known for its developed monasticism. The uninterrupted monastic tradition of Orthodox Christianity can be traced from the Egyptian desert monasteries of the 3rd and 4th centuries. Soon monasticism had spread all over the Mediterranean basin and Europe: in Palestine, Syria, Cappadocia, Gaul, Ireland, Italy, Greece and the Slavic countries. Monasticism has always been the spiritual guide of Orthodoxy and continues to make a strong and lasting impact on Orthodox spirituality.

The Orthodox Church today is an invaluable treasury of the rich liturgical tradition handed down from the earliest centuries of Christianity. The sense of the sacred, the beauty and grandeur of the Orthodox Divine Liturgy make the presence of heaven on earth live and intensive. Orthodox Church art and music have a very functional role in liturgical life and help even the bodily senses to feel the spiritual grandeur of the Lord's mysteries. Orthodox icons are not simply beautiful works of art with certain aesthetic and didactic functions. They are primarily the means, through which we experience the reality of the Heavenly Kingdom on earth. The holy Icons enshrine the immeasurable depth of the mystery of Christ's incarnation in defense of which thousands of martyrs sacrificed their lives.
